Executive Summary

While there are strong suspicions that there is constant availability of unskilled and low-skilled work in Cambodia, the number of Cambodians who have migrated to work in other countries (mostly Thailand) is widely believed to be over 1,000,000.

Prior studies have pointed that lack of information about national jobs might be at the source of a large part of cross-boarder migration. There is nevertheless no research that actually shows that job opportunities in Cambodia are available, nor about the present channels of information used between employers and potential workers that end up in effective unskilled or low-skilled employment inside the country.

To attempt to breach this information gap, Open Institute has collected data from human resource managers, present workers, and potential workers who are still in their place of origin.

The HR managers have provided information on how often they open recruitment processes, on the methods they use for recruitment, and on the effectiveness of these methods. We have also learned the level of technology to which they have access.

The current workers have provided information about why they decided to migrate nationally, how they found their first job, about their employment history, their opinion on working and living conditions, and about their access to Internet.

Potential migrants have told us if they were considering or not to migrate for work, about the information they where gathering for this purpose, about their preference for internal of cross-boarder migration, their perception about the working and living conditions they would expect inside or out of Cambodia, about their present economic situation, and about the means of communication to which they have access.

The data shows that there is constant availability of work all year round in the sectors of Manufacturing, Construction, Hospitality and Security, with a peak of labor demand after the two main holidays. The main and most effective method of communication used by companies to find new employees is to communicate the job opportunities to their existing workers, who relay this information to potential workers who might be interested. HR managers are nevertheless technology-savvy and they are open to use electronic channels to find new workers.

Potential migrants perceive that salary employment conditions and living conditions are good in both Cambodia and other countries, but - if given the choice - over 80% would stay in Cambodia, in order to stay closer to their family. Most would migrate only if they can work or live with or near family and friends who are already working. Potential migrants is provinces bordering Thailand would tend more to work in Thailand, while in other provinces they favor working in Cambodia, probably because in both cases that destination is where they can join family and friends who are already working.

Current workers were in general happy with their salaries and work conditions, and most of them actively participated in the task of providing job information to family and friends back in the village, often on home visits during the main festivals, but also by phone. They received information about available employment from their employers, but also from friends who lived near their place of residence or from billboards outside other companies.

An important point arising from the data in this report is that not only the flow of information, but also the level of trust between those who are already working and those who wish to work, leads to effective employment.

It was found that almost half of the current workers had access to Internet and Facebook, while only half of the potential workers had their own phone.

The main conclusion is that, while a clear mechanism for accessing low-skilled and unskilled employment exists in Cambodia based on the trust relationships between potential migrants and family members and friends who are already working, this mechanism is not sufficient to meet the demand for unskilled and low-skilled labor in the country, nor does it provide work in Cambodia to all potential migrants who would prefer to work in their own country. A significant portion of cross-border migration is most probably motivated by this disconnect.

A window of opportunity exists for employment services that use technology to help increase internal migration by improving the flow of information between employers and potential workers. These services will only succeed if they are able to adapt to the level of technology used by each stakeholder, and to make use of the existing trust relationships that facilitate effective employment.

Internal Migration Patterns and Practices of Low-Skilled and Unskilled Workers in Cambodia<sup>1</sup>

1 INTRODUCTION

1.1 Background of the study

Cambodia's labor force accounts for 70% of its population of approximately 15 million, with 250,000 to 300,000 new young workers entering the market each year (Tunon & Rim, 2013). When these potential workers are unable to access land for farming, cannot find or have limited access to information about jobs inside the country, or are offered more attractive wages abroad, they tend to consider leaving the country to seek work. In 2012, the average monthly earnings of paid employees in Cambodia were reported as US$119 (MoP, NIS, & IOM, 2013). This is insufficient to sustain many families, and is therefore a likely factor in the willingness of workers to migrate. Cambodian migrant workers receive a minimum monthly wage of 9,000 baht in Thailand (US$260), 900 ringgits in Malaysia (US$295) (Tunon & Rim, 2013), or 860,220 won in South Korea (US$734)<sup>2</sup>. Unfortunately, these minimum wages apply only to legal migrant workers; irregular migration methods (movement to another country without authorization to work) are currently more common among Cambodian migrants seeking jobs abroad.

Irregular migration is more convenient, faster, and cheaper than legal recruitment; the process takes less time for workers because they are not required to produce as many documents or complete complicated recruitment procedures. However, moving to another country illegally leaves migrants far more vulnerable to an array of problems. Some are subject to abuse and exploitation, including sexual and physical harassment, or become indebted to their employers and work under threat of punishment from local people, including authorities. Migrants in such situations are unable to protect themselves because they lack access to legal assistance. A study conducted by ADHOC in 2012 analyzed 141 complaints it had received from Cambodian migrant workers during the first four months of the year. ADHOC found that the most common challenges faced by migrants (both legal and illegal) included forced overwork, little or no rest time, untreated illness, torture, severe physical assault, underpayment, threats, jailing, being forced to continue working illegally, and denial of contact with their families. There are now estimated to be more than 1 million Cambodian migrant workers living in Thailand alone. Solid data is lacking, but approximately 200,000 illegal migrants were thought to have been deported by Thailand in 2014<sup>3</sup>.

One way to tackle this issue would be to create decent domestic employment opportunities and improve information/communication channels so that employers are better able to inform potential unskilled and low-skilled workers about job opportunities. To this end, the Royal Government of Cambodia (RGC) has developed the Rectangular Strategy Phase III, which should help to improve communication channels, and which attempts to promote economic growth and reduce poverty by fostering a domestic labor market. In 2009, the RGC established the National Employment Agency (NEA) to provide employment and labor market services within the country. The NEA plays a very important role in promoting the effectiveness of the labor market, enhancing participation within this market, reducing unemployment, and boosting growth and opportunity, with the ultimate aim of helping to reduce poverty<sup>4</sup>. According to NEA's labor bulletin<sup>5</sup>, from March 2010 to May 2015 some 3,633 job seekers registered with the agency to find jobs in the garment sector, in which there were 102,546 job vacancies. It also reported that 1,747 people registered to find jobs in the hospitality sector, in which there were 16,643 vacancies. A study conducted by the International Labour Organization (ILO) in 2012 surveyed 500 business establishments in six sectors (including garments, construction and hospitality) and found that there were more than 17,500 vacancies (14% of the establishments' total employment requirements). Vacancies in elementary positions were considered hard to fill in 75% of cases. Two-thirds of the establishments stated that recruitment problems delayed the development of new products, 52% said such problems resulted in increased workloads for existing staff, and 43% said the problems had caused them to lose business to competitors. This indicates that was many jobs available for unskilled and low-skilled workers in the garment, hospitality, and tourism sectors, a fact that needs to be validated for the present date.

1.2 Research Problems/Significance

The main problem examined in this study is the disconnect between the national demand for unskilled or low-skilled employment and the supply of potential workers who could cover those positions. In Cambodia, the supply of both skilled and (mainly) unskilled workers has not been sufficient to cover the notable growth in demand for labor (Bruni, Luch, & Kuoch, 2012).

A correlation might exist between the lack of information about available jobs in Cambodia and the number of workers who seek employment abroad, but the high number of cross-border migrants might also be related to other factors, such as the level of trust in prospective employers, or the expectations of potential migrants. Other possible factors are not discarded.

Cross-border migration leads to a much higher risk of a worker being driven into an employment situation that could clearly be considered human trafficking, and of very difficult employment conditions that do not correspond to the description provided at the time of recruitment. "Migrants working abroad report continuing difficulties, such as non-payment and underpayment of wages, substitution of contracts, harassment by government authorities, long work hours, confinement to the workplace, physical violence, sexual abuse, and problems of communications due to differences in language and culture. Those who enter through irregular channels or lose their legal status in foreign countries are vulnerable to exploitation. Some are cheated, robbed and killed. Many become victims of trafficking for forced labor and sex work." (Morris, 2007)

An increase in internal mobility would not only reduce the risk of human trafficking, but also benefit the Cambodian economy and aid national development by making more workers available to meet the demand for unskilled and low-skilled labor.

Tunon & Rim (2013) note that: "Cambodians should be able to migrate safely and undertake decent work in the country of destination, and they should be able to find decent work upon their return to Cambodia. Significant attention has been paid to the former and less to the latter."

Job seekers who are undereducated and reside in rural areas encounter many difficulties in accessing announcements of job opportunities offered by Cambodian employers and vice versa.

Empirical studies have examined the scale and extent, but rarely the systematic functionality or meaning, of labor migration in Cambodia. The latter approach is especially relevant to the country, however. Although the multi-scalar social implications of the country's economic development (Springer 2011, 2013a; Simone 2008) and the political-economic processes related to evictions and resettlement (Springer 2013b; Brickell 2014; Connell and Connell 2014) have received in-depth attention, only a handful of academic studies have emerged on internal migration as a process (e.g., Bylander 2014, 2015; Lim 2007; Maltoni 2006). Fewer still have explored the resulting broad social changes (e.g. Hughes 2001; Derks 2008; Parsons Lawreniuk and Pilgrim 2014). There have been no in-depth studies on the unskilled and low-skilled labor markets in Cambodia, the mechanisms of internal migration, or the knowledge and attitudes of potential internal migrants. Such information is sorely needed as a basis on which to propose evidence-based solutions that will realistically help Cambodian workers find jobs in their own country and reduce their vulnerability to trafficking by staying closer to their families. It would also be useful to governmental and non-governmental agencies working on this issue in Cambodia.

1.3 Research Objectives

To propose solutions to reduce the disconnect between the demand within the country for unskilled and low-skilled employment and the supply of potential workers one must first have an understanding of:

- The recruitment mechanisms used by companies in the target sectors;
- Unskilled and low-skilled workers' internal migration paths; and
- Potential migrants' knowledge about and attitudes toward migration, as well as their level of access to various communication channels that might be used to learn about employment opportunities inside the country.

On this basis, the goal of this study is therefore to fill the existing gap in the information needed to match providers of employment within Cambodia with low-skilled and unskilled workers.

To achieve this goal the following specific objectives must be fulfilled:

- i. To understand the hiring processes of Cambodian employers of unskilled and lowskilled workers in the targeted sectors and assess their interest in using simple and innovative technology-based mechanisms to attract domestic migrants.
- ii. To understand internal migration paths and practices, as well as workers' motivations for choosing internal (vs. cross-border) migration, for working in a particular sector, for changing sector, and for changing companies inside a sector; to identify the factors that might make a given job desirable; and to learn about workers' employment expectations for the future.
- iii. To gauge the knowledge and attitudes of potential migrants (pre-migration); to understand what migrants know about and expect from a job, what they fear, whom they trust, and other factors that might affect their decision to migrate; and to identify the reasons for choosing to migrate internally or across a border.
- iv. To identify the communication channels through which unskilled and low-skilled workers seeking employment might access employment information.

1.4 Micro-Hypotheses

These micro-hypotheses were developed based on the results of the qualitative study in the first stage of this project.

For Human Resources Managers

- 1. The most common method human resources (HR) managers use to find unskilled or low-skilled employees is to ask existing employees to find them.
- 2. HR managers would use technology-based recruitment services if available; the preferred device for accessing these services would be a smartphone.
- 3. There is a relationship between the time of year and the likelihood of an establishment hiring a recruitment agency. Furthermore, employers use such agencies to recruit low-skilled or unskilled personnel when all other methods fail.
- 4. In all four target sectors, demand for low-skilled and unskilled employees increases after Khmer New Year and during the rainy season.

For Current Workers

- 1. Workers share employment information with friends and family in their villages, and help them find work. They tend to share information on jobs available in their sector and/or location.
- 2. There is a positive correlation between years of experience as a migrant and the number of people a migrant has helped to get a job.
- 3. There is already a critical mass of workers in the target sectors who use smartphones and have Facebook accounts, making the use of Facebook as a tool to find unskilled and low-skilled workers a realistic option.
- 4. Migrants armed with job information before traveling are less vulnerable to trafficking than migrants who don't (including cross-border migrants).

For Potential Migrants

- 1. A significant number of potential workers do not have access to accurate employment information; new channels need to be developed to reach them.
- 2. There is a relationship between location of residence (proximity to the Thai border vs. living elsewhere in Cambodia) and a worker's decision on whether to migrate internally or externally.

1.5 Limitations and Challenges of the Study

The study was conducted on the following sectors: manufacturing (garment, footwear, apparel); hospitality (hotels, guesthouses, restaurants); construction; and security. The results of the study cannot be generalized to other sectors. The sample size of this study was statistically significant for the scope of the project but not at the national level. It is recommended that a larger sample size be used in further studies of internal migration in Cambodia.

Most lists of business establishments by sector in Cambodia are not up to date, making it necessary for our data-collection team to compile lists from various reliable sources. The team found it very difficult to contact establishments and gain permission to conduct interviews, which also necessitated keeping track of and following up interviewees by making direct calls and submitting formal letters.

2 MEANS AND METHODS

The Open Institute first conducted a qualitative study on "Internal Migration of Unskilled and Low-Skilled Work in Cambodia" to gain a preliminary understanding of the structure of the main sectors that absorb domestic migration, the current hiring processes of employers, and internal migration paths and practices. This first stage was used to define the micro-hypotheses that would be tested by the present quantitative study.

Based on the information gathered in stage 1 and the defined micro-hypotheses, the team developed surveys with clear and systematic questionnaires to gather quantitative information from employers, migrant workers, and potential migrants.

2.1 Study Population

Most Cambodian workers have low-skill jobs, mainly in agriculture but also in the country's other growing sectors: garments, construction, and tourism (hospitality) (D'Amico, 2009). Professional security guard companies have also emerged as an important source of employment for unskilled workers.

This quantitative study targeted three populations: a) HR managers (in this study, HR managers and other company representatives in charge of finding or selecting new employees are collectively referred to as "HR managers") of companies or factories within the garment, hospitality, construction, and security sectors; b) workers currently employed in these sectors; and c) potential migrants living in rural villages.

The study focused on these four sectors because they provide most of the non-agricultural job vacancies for low-skilled and unskilled workers. The manufacturing sector is the most complex in terms of variety of businesses, followed by hospitality, construction, and security. Far from being an assumption, this is consistent with the findings of previous reports.

First Target Population

Phnom Penh, the Cambodian capital, forms the heart of the national economy with a concentration of commercial interests including garment, hospitality, trading, and other enterprises. Siem Reap and Preah Sihanouk provinces are home to the country's major tourist destinations.

The qualitative results obtained in stage 1 showed Phnom Penh, Siem Reap, Preah Sihanouk and Svay Rieng to be the main bases for business establishments in the four target sectors. Therefore, HR managers currently working in these locations were considered the first target population of this quantitative study.

Second Type of Population

Workers who had migrated from their villages at least three months prior to being interviewed, and who were employed in one of the target sectors and destinations, comprised the second target population for the study.

Third Type of Population

Potential migrants who had never had a job outside their village and still resided at their place of origin were identified using five indicators (level of education, income, having a job near their village, whether they had an IDPoor card (which identifies them as being poor), and whether they had any debt). It was necessary to evaluate the knowledge and attitudes of potential migrants in two different zones. These zones needed to include provinces from which workers migrate mostly to Phnom Penh (according to the CRUMP report, the provinces of origin for the two largest groups of migrant workers to the capital were Kampong Cham and Prey Veng, respectively) and provinces from which workers migrate mostly to Thailand (Battambang and Banteay Meanchey, according to the same source).

2.2 Sample Size

First Type of Population

In order to develop the list frames for randomization, the research team made an effort to compile lists of establishments in the four target sectors from various sources such as the Garment Manufacturers Association in Cambodia (GMAC), the Cambodia Yellow Pages directory, the National Institute of Statistics, and relevant business associations. In total, there were over 20,000 establishments in the four target sectors. The target establishments in this study each employ at least five workers. A total of 250 samples were drawn randomly and proportionally by sector from among these 20,000-plus establishments. This sample size provides a confidence interval of 6.16, achieving a 95% confidence level.

Second Type of Population

According to the ILO's "Cambodia Labour Force and Child Labour 2012 Survey," there were 614,540 garment workers, 487,077 construction workers, and 325,249 accommodation and food workers. The number of security guards working in Cambodia is estimated at over 50,000. In the four target sectors, there are more than 1,400,000 workers in total, working for registered companies across Cambodia. Given this total number, a sample of 300 respondents was proportionally taken in relation to the size of each sector provides a confidence interval of 5.7. In the present study, current workers are defined as workers between the ages of 15 and 45 who are currently employed in one of the target sectors and who had migrated from their village at least three months prior. Current workers in the garment sector were not those currently employed by the randomized factories (getting permission from the randomized employers to interview workers was not easy), but those living near these factories (in the target locations).

Third Type of Population

According to the final report on the "Cambodia Inter-Censal Population Survey 2013 (NIS)" the population between the ages of 15 and 45 numbered approximately 6,500,000. The actual number of migrants who leave their villages and find low-skilled or unskilled jobs is surely lower than this; in this study, potential migrants are defined as villagers between the ages of 15 and 45 who, in three months prior to being interviewed, had not left their village to find a job. Potential migrants were defined according to five indicators: level of education, income, existence of job vacancies near the village, possession of an ID poor card, and existence of debt. The sample size of potential migrants was 240. Given a population of 6,500,000, the confidence interval was 6.3.

2.3 Sampling

First Type of Population

Using the list frame of over 20,000 establishments in the four target sectors, 250 samples were drawn proportionally from the four sectors and then proportionally by province. The rest of the establishments were kept as reserve establishments. These 250 samples were randomized, regardless of size (only those with at least five employees were included). At each establishment, the HR manager or another employer representative was interviewed.

Second Type of Population

Some 315 workers were drawn proportionally based on the total number of workers in the four target sectors. The proportion of workers in each sector by province was then calculated based on the total number of establishments in each sector in each province.

These 315 workers were purposively selected from these 250 establishments, with the criteria defined by the research team.

Third Type of Population

Multistage sampling using the Probability Proportional to Size (PPS) method was used to select a representative sample of workers aged 15 to 45 in households.

Four provinces were selected purposively, as they matched the criteria. A total of 24 rural villages were selected from across these four provinces. From each village, 10 potential migrants were identified and interviewed.

The cumulative population was divided by the number of villages in the provinces to generate the sampling interview. A random number between one and the sampling number was selected using the Excel random number function (RAND). The first village was the village in which this random number lay. Subsequent villages were identified by adding the sampling interval to the previous random number.

Systematic sampling was used to identify households. The interval of household for sampling was three (every third household was selected). At the village level, purposive sampling was applied in data collection to choose the respondents. Interviewers visited the households and interviewed the persons they met, screening out those respondents who did not meet the criteria.

2.4 Questionnaires

Three questionnaires were developed separately for HR managers, current workers, and potential migrants.

The questionnaire for HR managers was designed to include the following topics:

- Demographic information
- Hiring process
- Technology and communication

The questionnaire for current workers was designed to include the following topics:

- Demographic information
- Life before first internal migration
- First experience as internal migrant (inside Cambodia)
- Work path from first job to current job (inside Cambodia)
- · Migrant worker as intermediary and job seeker
- Mass media and communication

The questionnaires for HR managers and current workers were developed based on the information received from the qualitative results in stage 1.

The questionnaire for potential migrants was designed to include the following topics:

- Demographic information
- Knowledge of and attitude toward job information
- Use of mass media and communication

2.5 Data Collection

Data was obtained in face-toface verbal interviews based standardized form. on а Interviewers read each question to the respondent and recorded the answer. Data was recorded using tablets and an electronic questionnaire (implemented using the Open Data Kit).

Fieldwork was done by three separate data-collection teams. Two teams worked with HR managers (one supervisor and six data collectors on each team). The other team conducted fieldwork with potential migrants. In total, three supervisors and 18 data collectors were recruited and trained by researchers at Open Institute to perform these tasks.

Data collection from HR managers was conducted over a period of one-and-a-half months, from June 15 to July 31, 2016. Data collection from potential migrants was conducted over two weeks from July 12-28, 2016.

The research team made every effort to contact the establishments in order to get permission to interview their HR managers. However, we were ultimately able to do so at 95.6% of our 250 target establishments.

With the benefit of the experience of convincing HR managers to permit research teams to interview their workers for the qualitative study in stage 1, a response rate of over 100% was achieved for general current workers. By sector, the research teams achieved response rates of over 100% in some sectors and over 90% in others. The rate was below 100% in some areas because of the workers' limited availability.

Traveling to villages and identifying potential migrants was not as challenging as contacting HR managers and obtaining their consent to be interviewed them and permission to interview their workers. Data collection from potential migrants went as planned.

2.6 Data Management and Analysis

Data collection was done using tablets and the Open Data Kit software. Completed forms were checked by the supervisors before being synchronized with the Open Institute's server. The consistency checks and constraints imposed by the tablet questionnaire itself, together with the supervisors' pre-synchronization checks, guaranteed the accuracy and validity of the data.

The OpenOffice 4 spreadsheet and IBM SPSS Statistics 20 program were used to analyze the data. Descriptive analysis was used to calculate the frequencies of the key variables. Chi-square and correlation were used to show the association between variables for hypothesis testing.

2.7 Research Ethics

All interviewers and fieldwork team members were trained in ethical data-collection methods, including confidentiality and anonymity. All selected respondents were informed about the study and asked for their consent to participate in it. Respondents were able to skip questions or withdraw from the study at any time. No identifying information from respondents was used in the analysis. All completed forms were stored on Open Institute's server. Only those staff members responsible for data analysis had access to the data.

3 RESULTS

3.1 Information from HR Managers

Constant availability of low-skilled and unskilled work was confirmed by twothirds of the participating companies, which reported that they often have difficulty finding low-skilled and unskilled workers (we were unable to obtain precise details of the number of workers they needed or how long it takes for them to find them).

Seasonality of low-skilled and unskilled work was also established, with over half (54.9%) of the establishments indicating that every year they have difficulty recruiting workers in October (after the Pchum Ben festival) and in April (after the Khmer New Year). A third of them also identified September, November, and December as difficult months. Most workers take leave to visit their hometowns and villages during the Khmer New Year and Pchum Ben holidays; a number of them stay and do not go back to work. These holidays are a crucial time for exchanging information about job opportunities, a process that often leads to new first-time workers joining the employment market. Those who stay home often work in agriculture during the planting and harvesting seasons, after which they often search for jobs in the sectors that employed them earlier.

Direct communication with existing employees was confirmed by almost all companies as their preferred method of finding new workers, considering this method to be the most effective and least expensive. Advertising away from the factory and relying on intermediaries were used by some, but were not considered as effective.

Most jobs required employees to bring their National ID, to confirm identity and age. Many employers also required a second personal document (family book, birth certificate, etc.) to confirm the information, due to the low document security in the country.

The study confirms National Employment Agency data (NEA, 2015) showing that at least two-thirds of companies in the sectors of manufacturing, construction, hospitality, and security are owned by Cambodian citizens, and that a significant number of establishments are owned by Chinese speakers. The data and the experience of the data-collection teams confirmed that Khmer, English and Chinese are the most useful languages for communicating with company managers.

Almost all HR managers, with some variation depending on the sector, had smartphones, used the Internet, and had Facebook accounts. They showed an interest in using ICT-based employment services for recruitment purposes, and stated that they would use them if it did not involve paying fees.

3.2 Information on Current Workers

In agreement with data from the Ministry of Planning (MoP, 2012), the province that provides the most low-skilled and unskilled internal migrants is Kampot, followed by Prey Veng, Kampong Cham, Svay Rieng, Kampong Thom, Takeo, Kandal, and Siem Reap. Only one quarter of these workers had completed a basic education (through grade 9).

The top four destination provinces of first-time internal migrants were Phnom Penh, Preah Sihanouk, Siem Reap, and Svay Rieng, with Phnom Penh accounting for two-thirds of the participants. The largest group of participants worked in the manufacturing sector (43.6%) for their first job as internal migrants, followed by construction (19.1%), hospitality (15.4%), security (6.6%), and agriculture (2.5%). Type of first job as an internal migrant was influenced by gender, with manufacturing favored by women, construction by men.

Before migrating, almost 20% were still studying, and around 60% were either farming or helping a family business. The rest were either working locally or looking for local work. Those who were not students had interrupted their studies an average of four-and-a-half years before they migrated.

The study found that the first work destination of most respondents had been inside the country; only 14.1% had first worked outside the country.

Almost all of those whose first migration had been abroad had gone to Thailand, with the first migration lasting an average of three years. They had mostly received information about jobs from family, friends and neighbors, with only 16% having received information from brokers. Most had received the information in face-to-face conversations. The main reasons for migrating outside were having relatives/friends who were living there and earning higher salaries. When traveling abroad, 9% traveled with people they did not know or traveled alone. The main reasons for returning to Cambodia were bad living or working conditions, or homesickness.

Those who had migrated inside the country declared that the main reasons were personal security and wanting to remain close to family and friends. They had received information about jobs mostly from relatives, but also from friends and neighbors. Most of this communication had been face-to-face through conversations, and sometimes on the phone. Only 6% had traveled in search of a job without advance information, and only 7% moved to a place where they did not know anybody. Of those traveling to their first job, 25% had done so with people they did not know, and 10% had traveled alone.

For most jobs (84%), migrant workers were required to present personal documents.

On average, workers stayed in their first job for two years, with women staying longer, over twoand-a-half years average. Only 40% of migrant workers stated that they had to learn a skill for their first job, with an average of 18 days of training needed to reach a position where they could earn a stable salary.

The average monthly salary was $218. While construction workers received the largest salaries, manufacturing workers received benefits, resulting in similar income. total Hospitality salaries were lower, but this sector had highest level satisfaction regarding salaries, benefits and work conditions. Men received larger salaries than women, but women received more benefits, resulting in similar total income.

Almost three out of four workers said their working and living conditions met or exceeded their expectations, while only two out of three said the same of their salaries. Salary was the most important factor in job selection, but the position itself was also important to at least half of the participants.

While 17% of the worker's perceived their salaries to be bad or very bad, only 10% thought that their work conditions were be bad or very bad. About living conditions, only 12% thought that they were bad or very bad. Unhappiness about salaries was higher in Manufacturing, while working condition were considered worst in the Security sector. Living conditions were perceived to be worst by Security and Construction workers.

Two out of every three workers had advised relatives and friends about work opportunities, and helped them to get a job. In most cases they had communicated these opportunities face to face, but more than half had also used the phone. Almost all of these had communicated information about jobs available in their workplace; two-thirds of them had also communicated about jobs available near where they worked, which would allow the friend or relative to come and live with them.

TV was watched by 41% of the workers daily or weekly, but only 24% listened to the radio daily or weekly. Almost all workers had a phone, but only half of them had a smartphone. Most of those who had smartphones used Facebook (45% of all workers). They were less familiar with the idea and practice of navigating the Internet or doing searches; only 22% reported having done so.

Facebook use varied widely by sector: While two-thirds of hospitality workers used the social media platform, only one-third of construction and security workers did. Use by manufacturing workers was slightly below average at 44%.

3.3 Information on Potential Migrants

Potential migrants were defined by education and income level, but also by having a job near their village, an ID poor card (28%), and being in debt. Some 79% of them had not completed lower secondary school and 7% had never received any formal education. These potential migrants earned an average of $25 per month (net income). Considered individually and based solely on this personal salary level, these potential migrants lived in extreme poverty, earning less than a dollar a day. Furthermore, 59% of total potential migrants had more than $10 in personal debt (not family debt). In practice most were part of a nuclear family that could produce its own food to supplement cash income. They were mostly farmers, housewives or students.

Some 81% of the potential migrants claimed that there were no jobs available close enough to their village that they could return home to sleep. It seemed certain that sooner or later these potential migrants would leave their villages, as they were struggling to survive. Though they received support from their immediate families or other relatives, they were independent and would not receive this kind of support for much longer.

The findings show a correlation between levels of education and income, validating the idea that education is a means to higher income, more stable employment, and better working conditions (Fields, 1980).

Three out of every four potential migrants had at some point considered migrating for work. The main reasons the remainder had not considered it were the need to take care of family members, and fear of being trafficked. Only one-third of those who had considered migrating actually asked family, friends, or neighbors about job opportunities; half of them had asked about both national and international employment opportunities. The biggest portion of this communication happened in person, but a significant amount occurred by phone.

Potential migrants' perceptions of salaries and work conditions in Cambodia were surprisingly good, with only 15% considering salaries to be bad or very bad, and 11% thinking that working conditions would be bad or very bad. Perceptions of housing conditions were somewhat less favorable, with 22% of them considering that they were bad or very bad. Perceptions of work outside the country were even better, with only 5% believing that salaries were bad or very bad, and 11% believing work conditions were bad. In contrast, living conditions were rated as slightly worse abroad than in Cambodia (25% rating them bad or very bad).

Over half of the potential migrants considered manufacturing to be the most desirable sector to work in, followed by construction (half as desirable) and agriculture. Even for men, manufacturing was the more desirable sector, though less so than for women. About one-third claimed that they had already acquired the necessary skills for the job they desired.

Some 66.7% of potential migrants had heard about job opportunities through the radio, 64.2% through TV, 7.5% through Facebook, and 4.5% through other media (such as leaflets/flyers, newspapers, and websites). Relatives were the source of job information that participants trusted the most (88%). Some 26% said they trusted information from friends, 8.5% from neighbors, and 5.1% from local authorities. Of participants who had thought of leaving their village to find low-skilled or unskilled jobs, 90% said they would consider leaving the village if they learned of a job offer through relatives or friends. The most desirable option was to work in the same place as relatives or friends, followed by working and living near them.

A total of 33% of the participants trusted sources of job information other than direct personal communication. Of these, 69.4% trusted information from TV, 67.3% from radio, 4.1% from Facebook, and 3% from other sources such as newspapers or the Internet/websites.

The most important motivation for leaving the village was an opportunity to earn a high income and be successful, such as being able to buy farmland, build a house, or buy other products.

About half of potential migrants said their own desires would be an important factor in any decision on whether to leave and work away from the village; almost all cited the views of their family as an important factor.

Of those who had thought of finding a job outside the village, 81% claimed that they would prefer a job inside the country, whereas 19% responded that they would prefer to work abroad. Participants who lived in provinces near the Cambodian-Thai border (Banteay Meanchey, Battambang) tended to migrate externally, while participants who lived in provinces away from that border (Kampong Cham, Prey Veng) tended to migrate internally. This was most probably because they followed their relatives/friends' paths.

The main reason for preferring internal migration over external migration was that it was easy to visit family if they lived inside the country. Some 73.1% thought that Phnom Penh was the main destination for migration, followed by Siem Reap and Battambang. This was consistent with the results of the study on "Youth Migration and Urbanization in Cambodia" conducted by CDRI in 2007, which found that Phnom Penh was the most popular destination for young migrants, followed by Banteay Meanchey (Poipet), Siem Reap, and Battambang provinces.

On the other hand, the most important factor for potential migrants who considered a job abroad was salary. Regarding destinations outside Cambodia, a majority of potential migrants claimed that Thailand was the most desirable place for better jobs, followed by South Korea and Malaysia.

Traveling with relatives who had a job in the destination, or relatives from the village or friends who had a job there, was considered to be safe and comfortable by a majority of potential migrants. Most of them believed that traveling alone was dangerous and difficult. Traveling with companions was considered very important as a way of avoiding human trafficking.

As far as channels of communication are concerned, 17% of potential migrants listened to the radio daily, whereas 61% watched TV every day. Some 54% of them owned a phone, but only 12% of participants had a smartphone. These numbers are much lower than the rural average identified by Phong & Sola (2015). This difference is probably explained by the fact that participants were among the poorest of rural Cambodians. It was also found that 14% of general participants had Facebook accounts.

4 DISCUSSION

The data shows that there is constant availability of work all year round in the sectors of Manufacturing, Construction, Hospitality and Security, with a peak of labor demand after the two main holidays. The main method of communication they use to find new employees is to communicate the opportunities to the existing workers, who relay this information to potential workers who might be interested.

Most HR managers had access to the Internet through computers and phones, and were open to using electronic means to reach out to potential workers, even if they did not yet fully grasp their efficiency and would not invest in them if there was a financial barrier to entry (a fee). Two-thirds of the factories were Cambodian-owned; Chinese was management's working language in the second largest-group of factories.

As far as migrant workers are concerned, it seems that an impoverishment process leads to forced migration (due to drought, for example), but unexpected situations (e.g., illness of a family member) leading to indebtedness could also result in having to send family members away in search of work. It is interesting to note that only 12% of the workers interviewed stopped studying and migrated at the same time. The others had stopped their studies long before (over four years earlier on average), which would also seem to indicate a gradual process of impoverishment.

At the time of this study, three out of every four of the potential migrants identified had requested information about possible employment from family and friends who were already working. The others had not yet considered it, preferring to stay in the village and with family if possible. Their perceptions of work both inside and outside of the country were good, considering that salaries, work conditions and living conditions were good both inside and outside Cambodia. Over 80% would prefer working inside the country. Being closer to their family was an important factor in preferring internal migration over going abroad, even if not close enough that they could live in their own house. Four out of every five stated that they would prefer to work inside the country.

Over half of the potential migrants owned a phone, but very few owned a smartphone or had access to Facebook. Given that most Cambodian homes have a phone (Phong and Sola, 2015), it is assumed that the rest could be contacted through a home mobile phone (belonging to parents or a family member), and that most of them can therefore be informed of employment opportunities through a phone.

Those most likely to find work for them would be friends or members of their family who are already working. These workers already have a very different profile. They have access to money and have reached a level of technology use that is similar to the national average, with half of them having a smartphone and access to the Internet and Facebook.

Current workers were in general happy with their salaries and work conditions, and most of them actively participated in the task of providing job information to family and friends back in the village, often on home visits during the main festivals, but also by phone. They received information about available employment from their employers, but also from friends who lived near their place of residence or from billboards outside other companies.

An important point arising from the data in this report is that not only the flow of information, but also the level of trust between those who are already working and those who wish to work, leads to effective employment.

While there is a clear gender differentiation between sectors, with a clear preference among women for manufacturing, and among men for construction and security, there is no lack of employment opportunities for either gender. The total remuneration that can be expected is also similar, with a gap of less than 5%. It is interesting to note that the salary expectations of men before migration were much higher and less realistic than those of women; women had a more accurate idea of what they could expect to be paid. Female potential migrants had a much more positive perception about the availability of jobs outside the country, and a stronger tendency to migrate internationally. Men had better access to technology than women, but the gap was not large enough to produce a strong imbalance in terms of access to information.

5 CONCLUSION

While a clear mechanism for accessing low-skilled and unskilled employment exists in Cambodia based on the trust relationships between potential migrants and family members and friends who are already working, this mechanism is not sufficient to meet the demand for unskilled and low-skilled labor in the country, nor does it provide work in Cambodia to all potential migrants who would prefer to work in their own country. A significant portion of cross-border migration is most probably motivated by this disconnect.

The findings of this study make clear that it is important for both workers and industry to improve the flow of information between employers and potential employees, and that achieving this requires greater use of the trusted channels and relationships that lead to effective employment. At the same time, the new technological reality must be considered; employers have full access to information technology and are open to using it to find new workers, half of existing workers have direct personal access to it, and migrant workers are mostly able to access phones and are strong consumers of TV and radio.

A window of opportunity exists for employment services that use technology to help increase internal migration by improving the flow of information between employers and potential workers. These services will only succeed if they are able to adapt to the level of technology used by each stakeholder, and to make use of the existing trust relationships that facilitate effective employment.
